

Jim Knight's Instructional Coaching Workshops

Jim Knight and his colleagues have identified six essential domains (knowledge and skills) that need to be in place for instructional coaches to succeed. When any of these is missing, a coach's chances for success are significantly diminished.

The domains are:

- Understanding how to work with adults (which we refer to as understanding the complexities of helping and the partnership approach)
- Understanding the coaching cycle
- Understanding high-impact teaching practices
- Understanding how to gather data and use video as part of coaching
- Effective communication skills
- Effective leadership skills and systems thinking (what principals need to know about coaching)

Target Audience: Instructional Coaches, Administrators, Lead/Model Teachers

INSTRUCTIONAL COACHING SEMINAR

This instructional coaching seminar will provide a definition of the role and practice of instructional coaches. The various activities of instructional coaches will be highlighted and will be differentiated to consider the instructional coaching models and practices that may currently be in place. An overview of the current research on coaching will be provided. Effective and ineffective instructional coaching practices will be identified.
